Department: Department of History, JDSG College, Bokakhat, Assam

Date: Monday, 06 April 2026

Venue: Conference Hall, JDSG College, Bokakhat, Assam

Background and Objective

As part of the partial fulfilment of the course “Scope and Approach of Teaching History,” the Department of History, JDSG College, Bokakhat, Assam organised a PPT presentation on 06 April, 2026. The exercise was designed to develop the presentation and research skills of students and to deepen their understanding of complex historiographical debates in medieval Indian history.

The topic selected for the presentation – “Politics of Temple Destruction in Medieval India” – is a significant and nuanced subject in medieval Indian historiography. The session aimed to encourage students to analyse primary sources, historiographical arguments, and competing scholarly perspectives on this contested issue.

Conduct of the Presentation

The presentation was conducted in the College Conference Hall in the presence of faculty members, Dr. Chiranjib Dahal, Amarjit Hazarika, Akashi Phukan and Moyuresh Borthakur, and a full audience of students of the Department of History. The presenters delivered the session from a podium and used a projector-based slideshow to illustrate key arguments, historical evidence, and scholarly viewpoints pertaining to the topic.

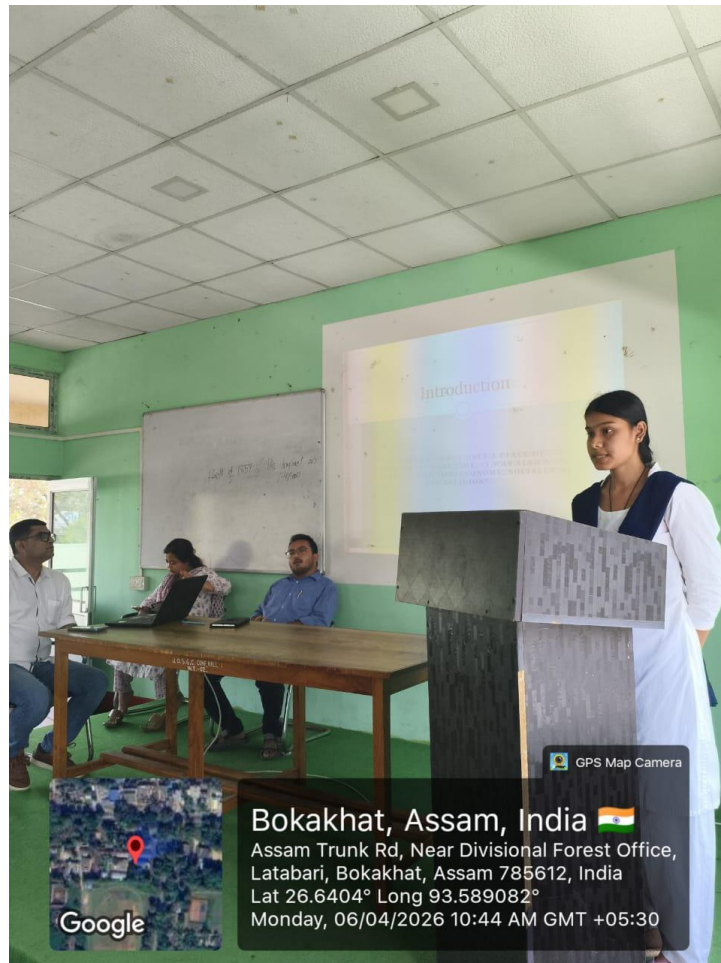

The session commenced with an Introduction slide, which laid out the scope of the topic, defined key terms, and provided a historiographical overview. The presenters systematically took the audience through the political, religious, and cultural dimensions of temple destruction during the medieval period in India, drawing upon relevant historical sources and secondary literature.

Outcome and Observation

The presentation was conducted successfully within the scheduled time frame. The presenters demonstrated a sound understanding of the topic, covering the historiographical debates surrounding the political motivations, religious symbolism, and contested narratives of temple destruction in medieval India.

The session served as an effective pedagogical exercise under the course “Scope and Approach of Teaching History,” helping the student develop skills in structuring historical arguments, using visual aids effectively, and communicating complex historical themes to an academic audience.

The faculty members present observed the session and noted the student’s ability to engage with the subject matter confidently. The exercise fulfilled the academic requirement prescribed under the partial fulfilment criteria for the course.
